One of the main draws of the sports bar is the creation of televisions for customers to watch the big game. People prefer to apt to come out, have a drink and party with their friends if they know they have a huge flat screen TV with all the action on it. Moreover, when you create a sports bar, televisions are probably the most important decorative element you need. Setting them up isn't much different from creating them at home. You simply need a good idea of the bar requirements. Inspect the space in the bar: all tables, chairs, booths and standing areas. You want TVs to be available in as many different locations as possible within your budget. Determine exactly how many TVs can afford the specified budget, factoring in the number of TVs that fit comfortably into the space. The good news is that LCD TV is getting cheaper by the day, making it fairly easy to pick up a big number of them. Don't forget to ally money with powerful mounting consoles, satellite or cable installations and monthly satellite or cable bills. Identify the central location of the sports bar - usually yourself in the bar - and put aside the main TV. It should be as big as fit - 40 inches or larger if possible. In some cases, you may want to place additional TVs next to it, especially if you want to show multiple sporting events at the same time. Create spots at your bar on smaller TVs where customers can live in stalls even to watch the game. Corners are usually in a good place and always place the TV high on the wall where you can see standing above customers. Note: places in the bar walls or roof, where you can run cables up to the satellite screen. Make sure they're easy to insert, that they look discreet, and that you don't have to run them on the floor or anywhere customers stumble over them. Call a satellite or cable company to set up a programming package. Ask about sports packages like the NFL Sunday Ticket and MLB Extra Innings: the more programming options you have, the better. DirecTV has a package specifically designed for bar owners, and other satellite companies can offer similar deals. Equip each TV show with a high-end mounting frame for the selected locale. If possible, fix them with pins on the wall, rather than drywall or similar material; this makes them strong. Call your satellite or cable company and install the programming package. Check each TV show to see if it works before the satellite installer leaves. Monitor your sports schedule locally (as well as national sporting events) and set up TVs to cover as many of them as possible. Tips If possible, buy high definition televisions and order satellite or cable packages to ge HD. You want the TVs looking their best to draw customers on game day.
